Re: Coalition Urges Preservation of Department of Justice Smart on Crime Guidance and related Policies

Dear Attorney General Sessions:

As partners in the Justice Roundtable, a national coalition of legal, civil rights, criminal justice and faith-based organizations dedicated to advancing a fairer federal criminal justice system, we write to urge you to maintain the Smart on Crime Initiative. We are troubled by reports that you plan to issue new prosecutorial guidance that would toughen drug charging policies for nonviolent offenses. The country has made great strides towards a more proportional and cost-effective criminal justice system at the federal level through the Smart on Crime Initiative. We urge you not to change or rescind the guidance associated with this initiative by pushing Department of Justice prosecutors to pursue harsher penalties for drug offenses.

There is broad bipartisan consensus across the country that harsh mandatory minimum sentences for low-level drug offenses are disproportionate, expensive and cruel. States across the country have taken steps to reform their drug laws by reducing sentences, diverting people to treatment instead of incarceration and reclassifying certain felony drug offenses to misdemeanors. Indeed, as a senator, you also championed critical mandatory minimum sentencing reforms for crack cocaine that have contributed to more fairness in the criminal justice system. We applaud this national trend and are pleased by the additional actions taken during the previous administration to limit the application of excessive mandatory minimum sentences in low-level drug cases.

As noted in the President's budget blueprint, the Bureau of Prisons has achieved a substantial population reduction in its overcrowded prison system, providing the Department of Justice significant cost savings and flexibility in its funding choices. The population decrease was due to a number of factors, including the Smart on Crime initiative which helped to focus prosecutors on the most serious crimes and shift federal prosecutions away from low-level drug offenses to allow state prosecutors take those cases, if they so choose.<sup>1</sup> Reversing this directive would surely require a steep increase in spending, exacerbate overcrowding and jeopardize the safety of staff and prisoners.

Despite the recent reduction, we still have a federal prison population that is vastly expanded since 1980, replete with overcrowding issues mentioned in the President's budget. Mandatory minimum sentences for drug offenses significantly contributed to many of these problems. They have overwhelmingly impacted people of color, contributing to the appalling racial disparities we see in our federal prison system. Fundamentally, these harsh sentences produce diminishing returns for public safety, deny people a second chance to rectify their past mistakes and harm the record number of children growing up with a parent behind bars.

Research over many decades has demonstrated that the deterrent effect of the criminal justice system is a function of the certainty of punishment, not its severity. Your new proposed policy shift would have little impact on public safety, while adding exorbitant costs to an already bloated prison system.

In the last few years, our country has taken important steps to reorient enforcement priorities to address pressing public safety concerns and alleviate the disparate impacts of the criminal justice system. The Justice Roundtable asserts that it would be a grave mistake to go backward. Accordingly, we strongly urge you to maintain the guidance and policies associated with the Smart on Crime Initiative.

We look forward to your response. Please direct follow up inquiries to this letter to Jesselyn McCurdy, American Civil Liberties Union, at (202)675-2307 or jmccurdy@aclu.org.
